Iran has stated that no proposal regarding a ceasefire has been made to the United States. The government has firmly rejected such claims as “completely false and baseless.”

On Wednesday (April 1), Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesperson Ismail Baghaei said in a statement to state media that there has been no communication or exchange of proposals with Washington regarding a ceasefire.

Meanwhile, former U.S. President Donald Trump claimed that Iran's new leadership had contacted the United States regarding a ceasefire.

According to his remarks, such a proposal would only be considered if the Strait of Hormuz is fully “open and normal.”

However, Tehran has directly dismissed these allegations, stating that there has been no discussion or proposal on a ceasefire whatsoever.

Amid this situation, the contradictory statements from both sides have further deepened uncertainty, adding to the ongoing tensions.
