

Iran War Nearing Its Final Stage, Trump Addresses the Nation

Trump addressing the nation. Photo: Collected

Trump said the Iran campaign has nearly achieved its goals and is in its final phase. He added that stronger strikes could follow if needed to end the conflict quickly.

He claimed that Iran's naval and missile capabilities have suffered significant damage. However, he did not provide a specific timeline for the end of the war. He also suggested that if a diplomatic solution is not reached, key facilities could be targeted.

Meanwhile, tensions around the Strait of Hormuz continue to rise. Disruptions in this vital shipping route have pushed global oil prices higher, adding to growing concern in international markets.

Iran, on the other hand, has rejected claims of any ceasefire proposal from the US, calling such reports completely baseless, according to its foreign ministry.

US Senator Chuck Schumer strongly criticized Trump's remarks, describing the war as a major policy mistake in American history.

The US military has stated that multiple targets have been hit during the ongoing operation. However, the situation remains unstable, with tensions continuing across several parts of the Middle East.

Recent surveys show that a majority of Americans support ending the war quickly, and many oppose continued military action.